Sherlock Holmes was consulted by Dr. Percy Trevelyan, a fashionable physician, who explained that when he had passed his examination he had no means of setting himself up in practice. A man named Blessington had come forward and offered to set him up, receiving in exchange two-thirds of all fees and remaining the house as Resident Patient. One day Blessington was taken ill while reading something in a newspaper. The same morning Trevelyan was consulted by a stranger who collapsed during the consultation. Trevelyan left the room, and on returning found the patient gone. Blessington was terribly unnerved when he heard of the occurrence, and going to his room found it had been searched. Then he begged Trevelyan to fetch Holmes. Reading the newspaper Holmes found that Hayward and Moffatt had completed their sentence for the robbery of the Colony Bank. He suspected that Blessington was really Sutton, a member of the gang who turned King's evidence. Next morning Blessington was found hanging from the chandelier in his room, and Holmes proved to his own satisfaction that Hayward and Moffatt had come on an errand of vengeance and killed the informer.
